	Introduction: While the international legal order has traditionally been tilted towards the west, a shift in emphasis may be occurring towards East Asia. Regional approaches to international law are gaining prominence and emerging powers are demanding a greater voice. This changes the dynamics of the making and interpretation of international law, which serves a dual role as a procedural framework for dispute settlement but also a vehicle for making and breaking consensus on international norms across a number of important fields.
	Hypothesis and Objectives: The emergence of China as well as the increased familiarity of other states with international law and institutions will change an originally Western system and make it more truly universal. The objectives of this project are both to understand how this affects the foundations of the international legal system as well as specific regimes. It can focus on one area of law, including international trade, the law of the sea, and international peace and security or take a broader view.
	Impact: The project will improve the mutual understanding between Western and other approaches to international law. It will contribute to the development of a framework through which the way international law is used by states and other actors can be understood.
Methodology	The project methodology varies from doctrinal legal research to interdisciplinary approaches, analysing the law from historical, political and sociological perspectives. The research will be conducted within the Department of International and European Law of the Faculty of Law.
